Advice for the road

Oil tips

Herald Special

The prime purpose of an engine oil is to lubricate. Motor oil prevents such moving parts as cylinder walls, piston rings, bearings, crankshafts, camshafts, valves, valve guides and followers from rubbing together.

Oil helps stop engine corrosion and rusting from condensation or from the acids formed in the combustion chamber. Lubricants keep the engine clean by preventing contaminants from depositing on engine parts. Oil also helps cool the engine.

Companies like Shell Canada continue to test new oils to meet the demands of consumers and the automotive industry.

One way a consumer can judge the quality of an oil is to find the American Petroleum Institute's designation on the can. The gasoline engine oils of today are generally of SF quality, the letter S indicates that it is of service station quality.

These quality levels represent only minimum performance requirements. For example, two SF quality oils may differ in that one contains better additives than the other, and therefore offers superior performance. The oil formulation must determine the required performance level.

In choosing a motor oil it is important to be aware of viscosity, or the measure of an oil's resistance to flow. Oil is graded for viscosity at a range of temperatures. Multigrade motor oils meet viscosity limits at both temperature extremes.

A car owner's manual offers relevant information for the selection of the viscosity grade of the motor oil to be used under different temperature ranges. To ensure the best selection of the appropriate oil grade, consult your local service station dealer.
