Orchard ravaged by deer farmer bemoans 'Bambi syndrome'

Herald Special

If deer are to be controlled like other farm pests without resorting to a hunting season the only solution would be to change ministry of natural resources regulations. a Halton farmer says.

Mac Traas, a fruit

farmer representing the Halton-Wentworth growers on the Halton agricultural advisory committee, says that although he personally suffers heavy crop damage because of deer, he can sympathize with those who oppose deer hunting because they feel it isn't safe in an area with as large a population as Halton.

Mr. Traas says the MNR Act which elevates deer above other pests must be changed so that farmers can do away with them as they do other destructive creatures. The problem with that is the "Bambi syndrome" associated with gentle. beautiful deer.

Mr. Traas said in consulting with the MNR. some time ago about problems with deer and possible solutions he learned he could buy a dog and chain it in the orchard but he couldn't let it run loose. He could also paint all his trees if it weren't impractical.

"I can legally poison any rabbit or mice or even a dog that comes on " my property and causes problems," he says, "but I can't hurt one hair on a cute little deer." The ministry seems to be conscious of the special status deer have but they don't dare tackle public opinion to do anything about the situation.

Mr. Traus says he has encouraged hunters during the controlled hunts in Halton the past two years and "never had a more cooperative, polite crew" than they were to deal

Despite his underlying sympathy for hunt opponents who wrote regional council stating their opposition would continue because hunting isn't safe in such a built-up area as Halton, Mr. Traas put forward a resolution recommendation that under the present system deer hunting is necessary in Halton and should be continued. The recommendation will be forwarded to regional council.

The building was completely painted within, and for the second consecutive year a considerable amount was placed in bonds. The ball team won the championship again.
