

'No doubt this book provides evidence'

years that I have spent in the business, except that in those far-off days we were together more often because of the 60-hour-plus work-week that was then the norm.

June Callwood's foreword in The News struck the right chord when she wrote that Content was "always intelligent and it unflinchingly was honorable."

Of that there is no doubt and this book provides the evidence. Its editors gave it their best and their best was very good indeed, despite the obvious feeling that nothing beats hindsight when it comes to evaluating another's decisions or actions.

However, it is a matter of regret that the authors don't specify the years each was involved with Content, or who is publishing it now.

It's clear that MacDonald began publishing it in Montreal in 1970, that somewhere in between Zwicker took over and kept things going until some time in or after 1980. Other than that the dates are fuzzy. And not a word is said about Toronto's Humber College, now doing the job.

Fraser MacDougall is former head of the Ottawa bureau of Canadian Press.

Canadians spend less income on food

If you've felt squeezed by inflation and rising food prices over the past year, here's news that may surprise you: Canadians are actually spending less of their incomes on food than ever before. The trend toward food taking a smaller share of disposable income, which has been underway in Canada for many years, continued in 1982 despite the recession, the Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada reported today.
