CO-OP shows them the business world

The co-operative program for students has grown to about 125 students in the past three years at Georgetown and District High School.

The co-op work placement allows students from the high school to spend time working for Georgetown businesses on a part-time basis.

Thursday night the high school held a reception for the students and various businesses involved.

Special guests of honor were from Varian Inc. of Georgetown who recently won an award at a provincial gathering of co-op associations.

Each of the co-op students received a certificate and every business who participated was awarded a plaque for their cooperation.

A panel of four students talked to those attending the reception about their experiences with the co-op program.

Lisa Green talked about how she was able to work with pre-school children at the Georgetown YMCA.

She said after spending some time with the mentally handicapped at Park School at another co-op term she realizes this is the field she wants to pursue as a career.

Tracey Charles worked with the Halton Regional Police Force during her co-op stay.

She said it was interesting to see what the officers did on a day to day basis, noting that she was able to go on a foot beat, car patrol and see an autopsy.

As a result of her time there, Tracey has decided to pursue a career with the police and she has applied to both the Halton and Peel police forces.

Doug Richardson was involved with physical education program at Centennial Public School.

He felt it was a very positive experience working with kids.

Crime Prevention Constable Bob Ustryzki spoke to the gathering about how as an employer he felt about the program.
