

Acton teachers picking up tips

Monday afternoon, Acton High School teachers picked up a few tips on how to teach better from their peers. Louise Krueger and Ken Ellis shared their experiences gained at the Learning Styles Institute in New York City this past July.

The authors of "Teaching Students Through Their Individual Learning Styles" taught the Acton High teachers the testing program they've developed to identify 21 unique elements of learning style preferred by individual learners.

Research data being compiled supports their theory that there are noticeable increases in student achievement when the teaching style matches learning style.

Monday afternoon's presentation of instructional techniques is part of a series of professional development programs at the high school aimed at matching teaching and learning styles. Area residents are welcome to attend these presentations.

The sick chairman is Mae Lawr and her phone number is 877-9109. Get in touch with Mae to report anyone who is ill or in hospital.

Our ladies are doing a terrific job at the theatre this week while the revue, "We'll Meet Again" is playing, the opening ceremony on Thursday was impressive with the presentation of the flags and the introduction of the standard bearers to the audience. Matthew Hennessey was introduced as the only veteran present from the 1st World War which he acknowledged with a salute. Jean Reid, 877-2535, has several tickets left for the ladies night Oct. 18. If you wish to purchase, call Jean.

Struggling authors suffer under tax says chief librarian

Some day you may be paying Canadian authors for their books you take out of the public library, said Betsy Cornwell, chief librarian at the Georgetown Library. It's called a public lending rate.

You would not pay directly but through a national fund like Canada Art Council from which money would be taken and given to authors whose books are popular in libraries.

Some Canadian authors believe they should be rewarded for books which become public property and are read over and over but are only paid for once. "They are robbed of the fruits of their labor. It's like a contravention of a copyright," Mrs. Cornwell said.

The Canadian government would choose different libraries, probably city libraries, to monitor circulation of Canadian books. Money given to authors would be based on that circulation.

"It wouldn't be a problem at the Georgetown library to keep such records because we are computerized, but I don't think we would be picked," Mrs. Cornwell said.

She also said she didn't support the idea because the struggling authors whose books are seldom read would not receive much money. Only the authors who are already making a good living would benefit because their books sell and are widely circulated at libraries.

Authors in one Scandinavian country, Britain and Australia receive money from public lending right programs. Some British authors refuse the money because they make enough and would like to see poor writers get it, Mrs. Cornwell said.

There is not much chance now of authors receiving a public lending right under the Conservative government, Mrs. Cornwell said. "They (Canadian authors) felt they were getting close under the Liberal government," she added.
