No north-south battle: Little

By ANI PEDIERIAN

Feathers were ruffled at last week's regional council meeting when a Burlington councillor tried for a second time to do away with $2 million designated for a transfer station in the 1988 Halton capital budget.

Halton Hills Coun. Mike Armstrong was angry and suggested Burlington Coun. Joan Little decide whether she wanted to keep Halton Hills as part of the region of Halton.

"This is developing into a north-south argument rather than a financial argument, and it's intended solely as a financial argument," Coun. Little said.

She said the Walker Wright Young report indicated a transfer station wouldn't be necessary in the region, and objected to the fact regional staff had put monies for a transfer station in the solid waste capital budget for 1988.

"We've got our staff, one more time, establishing the budget rather than the people around this table," Coun. Little said. "I guess I get kind of angry when I feel we're being pre-empted in this process."

At a recent administration and finance committee meeting, the councillor's attempt was defeated. In a recorded vote, 13 to 5, this defeat was repeated by regional council last Wednesday.

Transfer stations are a touchy issue in Halton Hills. Regional councillors feel the region should be paying for the one in Georgetown. So far, the town picks up the tab for the Armstrong Avenue transfer station where local garbage is compacted and trucked down to the Burlington dump.

The physical distance between Halton Hills and the sole regional dump makes garbage an expensive issue for local taxpayers and industries. Halton Hills regional councillors don't think that's fair, pointing to waterworks projects in the south that they contribute towards yet don't derive any benefit from.

Halton region is currently looking at two sites for a new regional dump. One is in Milton and the other in Burlington.

The regional treasurer has explained that the most costly of the two dump sites has been budgeted for in the five year capital forecast for Halton.

"Let's not forget, it's a lot easier to take something out of the budget down the road than put it in," Halton Hills Coun. Dave Whiting reminded regional councillors. "If the transfer station becomes a part of the regional responsibility, then the $2 million is there. It goes in a lot easier than it comes out."

Burlington Coun. Walter Mulkevic said Coun. Armstrong was protesting too much. "Nowhere is it stated where the transfer station will be. Coun. Armstrong may be making assumptions," Coun. Mulkevic said.

"For heavens sake, it might even be in Aldershot. I don't know," he said. Solid waste committee chairman Ann Mulvale supported the treasurer's report and said having the $2 million in the budget was good planning.
