Family moved into park horse stalls to be converted into home after father's fishing boat taken away

Terry Nakagawa was born and brought up in a little village close to Port Rupert, British Columbia, and she remembers being among the first Japanese-Canadians to be moved south to Vancouver.

"When the war started, we were among the first to be evicted, because they started from the north," Mrs. Yahiro (nee Nakagawa) of Georgetown's Chelvin Drive recalled.

Her father Sasuke Nakagawa, was a fisherman with his own boat. However, the boat was taken away from him in 1942, and Mrs. Yahiro, now . 58, doesn't remember if her father was reimbursed for the loss of his boat.

A young teenager at the time, Terry and her brother and two sisters were put on the train to Vancouver. Her father, mother and baby sister made the trip by boat because Mrs. Sute Nakagawa was in ill-health. It was February.

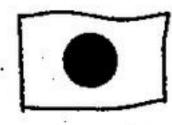

The train seats slid into beds, Terry remembers, and best of all, she remembers being served toast and boiled eggs in the morning.

From tiny port Essington, the Nakagawa family moved into the horse stalls at Vancouver's Hastings Park. They were among the first Japanese families moved into the race track built for horse racing.

"My father was a veteran from the First World War, and, I think it was because of that, he didn't have to go to road camp like the other Japanese men." Mrs. Yahiro sald.

At Hastings Park, the men and women were segregated in the buildings. The floor was concrete and there was lots of noise.

"I remember sleeping on the top bunk, from where I could see everybody from above the stalls and wave to people," Mrs. Yahiro smiled. "We put curtains across the stalls to have privacy."

The alling Mrs. Nakagawa didn't have to line up for meals in the mess hall like the rest of her family. Instead, she ate her meals inside the same building, at a special dining hall for invalids.

Evantually the family was able to arrange for Mrs. Nakagawa to stay with relatives who lived in Vancouver. so she could be a little more comfort-

The new council, which sits in December, will have to deal with this matter, when the committee report comes back.

"It must have been terrible, the family decisions that had to be made. In my family, we didn't have that conflict, right from the start we knew we weren't going back," Mrs. Yahiro said. "To us, this was our country." The family chose to go to Montreal and from there to Toronto. Today Mrs. Yahiro is a mother of three and lives on Georgetown's Chelvin Drive.

Mrs. Yahiro doesn't hold any resentment about what happened to the Japanese-Canadians during World War Two. As a child during those years, she was spared the difficult decisions and the worries of her parents, she said.

"That generation seemed to accept things. They had a 'can't be helped' sort of attitude," Mrs. Yahiro tried to explain of her parents' generation.

She said she had no unpleasant memories of the experience, and said those who would have the unpleasant memories would more likely be the older ones, the ones that had to feed their family and worry about their

"But our attitude is, let bygones be bygones," she said, pointing out that although the Japanese were forced to start from scratch, they've done very well for themselves.

Former waterbed store hardware outlet on Guelph

Written comments are being received by the town until Nov. 28 on the application to rezone the former Irwin Dorsey property from industrial to commercial.

Dec. 9, the newly elected counciliors will be debating this application, and a staff report with comments and additional data as to the merits of the change will be available.

The 2.49 acre property at the northeast corner of Guelph Street and Sinclair Avenue in Georgetown has 23,000 square feet and a numbered company wants to develop it so it houses restaurant, financial institution, office uses and a home-hardware wholesale operation and retail outlet of 10,000 feet.

At Monday night's council meeting, the solicitor for the numbered company said his client is someone currently in the hardware business in town, operating in a two floor facility which is proving to be constrictive and a handlcap for future development.

Noting the Irwin Dorsey building has been empty for the last two years since Haisey's Waterbeds moved out and most recently Mike Armstrong's campaign supporters, lawyer Bert Arnold said it's been a difficult building to get any industry to take on because of its size.

Mr. Arnold said he is applying for an Official Plan amendment to permit the commercial and retail uses intended for the site.

He noted the nature of the building, much like a warehouse is ideal for his client who currently has problems storing 12 foot planks and heavy hardware. As well, the larger building will allow his client to get into building, electrical and plumbing supplies, for the industrial park just behind.

"The applicant feels there's a market for these supplies in town. We're just trying to keep the dollars in Halton Hills rather than going to Toronto, Brampton or Hamilton," Mr. Arnold sald.

Nobody spoke either in favor or in opposition to the application to make these amendments to the Official Plan and to the property zoning.
