

Anti-porn laws went too far

A local anti-pornography group spokesman finds part of the federal government's proposed changes to the Criminal Code on pornography too tough.

Citizens Against Violent Pornography (CAVP) is pleased with laws which make the possession of child pornography illegal. They believe other stronger changes to pornography laws will not solve the pornography problem.

"The best defense against pornography is good erotica," said Gail Rutherford, chairman of CAVP. "Erotica is the demonstration of healthy human sexuality. There is no sense of power and participants are totally consenting. It doesn't have to be graphic or explicit," she said.

The government's new definition of pornography could limit erotica or healthy sex, Ms. Rutherford said. "The definition could exclude anything, even kissing," she said.

The government definition of pornography includes a list of taboo activities plus a general clause which could cover anything not clearly defined.

Words in the government definition such as "other sexual activity" are too vague and have CAVP apprehensive about the proposed amendments. Ms. Rutherford would also like to see the words promotion and degradation a part of the definition.

"Pornography is material which promotes abusive, degrading sexuality," Ms. Rutherford said.

A film on sexuality in a Nazi concentration camp might be considered pornographic, but it is not promoting pornography. It would be a historical presentation condemning, not promoting, pornography, Ms. Rutherford said.

The CAVP would like the word degradation put in the government's definition of pornography. The government does not consider nudity, sexual or pornographic, Ms. Rutherford said. This is fair.

A film showing four men stripping a woman's clothing off and then urinating on her would not be pornographic, because it is not sexual, Ms. Rutherford said. If the word degrading was in the definition, the film would be considered pornographic. It is not sex, but it is degrading, Ms. Rutherford said.

Most child pornography is privately produced and is circulated among pedophiles, she said. There are cases of people having thousands of examples of child pornography, and the police can do nothing, she noted.

Before the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code become law, they go to committee. If they go to committee in the summer they may become law by fall, Ms. Rutherford said. If the amendments go to committee in the fall then it could be next year before they become law, she said.
