

Delegation addresses board on issue over local doctor

A delegation was allowed to address the Georgetown hospital board of directors yesterday evening about a decision to revoke Dr. Jack Ford's hospital privileges.

According to executive director of the hospital, Mark Rochon, four people were allowed to address the board.

The meeting occurred after Outlook went to press, but details will be available in the Wednesday edition of The Herald. A reporter from The Herald was also invited to attend the meeting.

Delegation members were asked to keep their comments limited to 15 minutes, said Mr. Rochon.

A six member delegation will attend the board meeting while other supporters of Dr. Ford were asked to wait outside during the meeting.

Meanwhile, Mr. Rochon said an appeal in the case of Dr. Ford is up to the Ontario Hospital Appeal Board and the doctor who has to apply for the appeal hearing, he said.

While the Georgetown District Memorial Hospital has to inform the College of Physicians and Surgeons about the doctor's removal of hospital privileges, the College is not yet involved in the process, he said.

The executive director said Wednesday he was investigating a case where a patient of Dr. Ford's had been refused a lab test. He could not comment further.

Dr. Ford does not have observer status at the Georgetown hospital and could not be with a patient during an operation or medical procedure, said Mr. Rochon.

Whodunnit?

Until the end of the play, only Agatha Christie knows for sure. Georgetown Little Theatre is performing the suspense thriller Ten Little Indians starting tonight at the John Elliott Theatre. Three of the characters in the play are (from left) Lori Kertner, Ashley Windsor and Rod Cook. Directed by Neville Worsnop, the play runs April 24, 25, 29, 30, May 1 and 2. The story was first published in 1939 and has been made into at least two films. It's about 10 people together on an island who are being systematically killed by an unknown murderer.
