

In this shot, the Main Street fish and chips store is being used by the camera crews to shoot action outside on the street. Pedestrians, cars and bicyclists are used as backdrops while the main character, Norman rushes by as his dad watches from inside the coffee shop.

An assistant director converses with a member of the crew while trying to get together some of the background actresses or 'extras' needed for the next scene. The time taken between actual shooting of the scenes can take hours.

With the sound equipment and lighting ready, all everyone is waiting for is the actors to get their lines straight. It takes many tries before a scene is shot. Here, at the corner of Main and Mill Streets in Georgetown Sunday, crews prepare to film a scene from the movie Almost Grown.

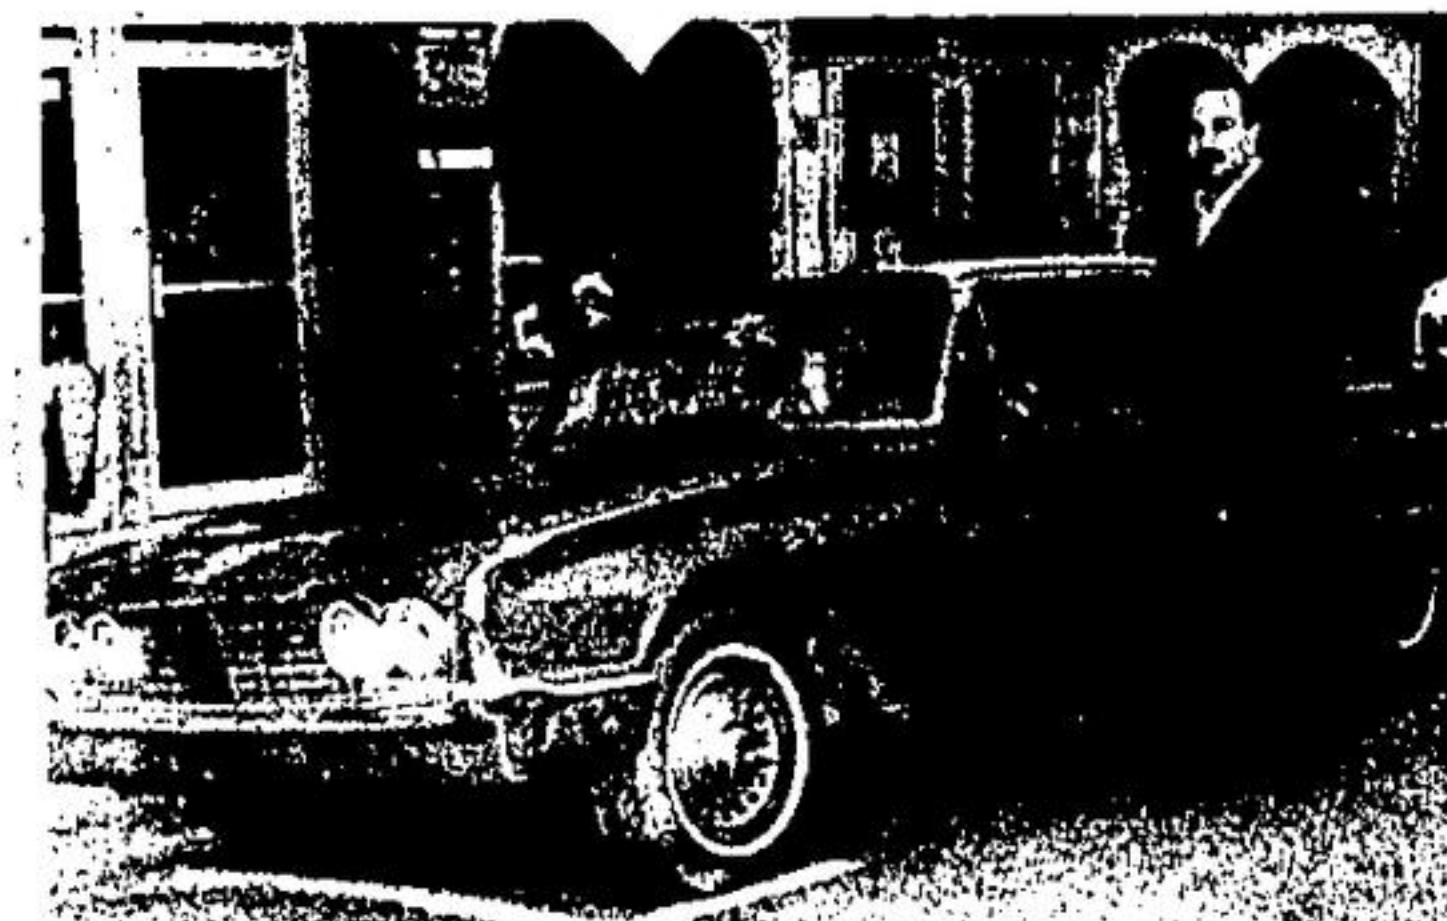

This Creamfield milk truck is a real find for the movie Almost Grown. Vehicles were required for the film which would depict life in the 1960s. Fortunately an Acton man came to the rescue after an ad was placed at the Milton Steam Era show in September.

One of the highlights for those observing the movie-making on Georgetown's Main Street Sunday was viewing all the vintage cars which were being used for the shoot. Some of the cars belonged to local members of the Georgetown car club.

The look of Main Street in downtown Georgetown took on a transformation Sunday when movie crews rolled into town for the shooting of a film called Almost Grown. Here, action on the street includes old-style bicycles, vintage automobiles and actors walking along the sidewalks posing as pedestrians.

Walter Kokot of Park Avenue in Georgetown, Mr. Kokot was an extra during the shooting and will be able to see himself on film next fall when the movie is released.

Norman Folly is the main character of the made-for-TV movie Almost Grown, starring American actor Timothy Daley. Here he is seen with a school jacket acting out a scene from 1962.
