

DEAR MEG

Meg Whitcomb

He must defuse brewing anger

By Meg Whitcomb

DEAR MEG — Talking to my boyfriend is like testing a bomb. No matter what I say or how hard I try to make things work, he's angry. He says he loves me, but there's always anger simmering under the surface. It's directed at everything, not just me.

He says I don't love him enough, which is getting to be true. It's hard to keep loving someone when you feel you're going to trigger an explosion any minute. The tension is getting to me. Is there any hope for us? He has wonderful attributes that show themselves when he's not upset. — MAD-DENED, LINCOLN, NEB.

DEAR MADDENED — Your boyfriend is a troubled man. You are perceptive to see that his rage is not directed at you alone. However, chances are, as you get deeper into the relationship, you will become the sole butt of his outbursts.

He needs a great deal of help in recognizing his anger and finding its underlying causes. They may lie in his childhood and poor relationships with his parents, which he has buried because they're too painful or guilt-provoking to acknowledge.

Your boyfriend's only hope lies in counseling. You could offer to go, too, to learn how best to communicate and deal with him.
