Once upon a time, in a cabbage patch in the Old Country, four boys were born to Mama Romaniac. Faboos, blood oaths and the kinds of good taste prevent a complete disclosure of details. The babies were dispatched to different communities in North America. Many years later, they were reunited at a family reunion in Climax, Sask.

The four men pooled their talents and formed a vibrant quartet, the Romaniacs. They mix traditional European folk music with hot jazz and zany comedy.

Aside from their musical talents, the Romaniacs are receiving rave reviews on their current Canadian tour - the "brothers" have a great flair for comedy.

Their imagination is not limited by the bounds of reality.

The Romaniacs, and their public relations troops, have churned out such a mish-mash of dubious facts, you need a truckload of salt before swallowing tidbits of information.

Jersey's Polaski Skyway.

—Yanus Zsaiu Romaniac III (also known as Scott White) grew up in Montreal, where he discovered that music therapy and kosher dill pickles go great together.

—Zalmer Nickolai Romaniac (also known as Ron Thompson, one of Canada's best jazz guitarists) says he was found many years ago floating on a life raft in the Georgia Strait. Once on dry land, he settled in Vancouver.

The Romaniacs, unless sidetracked by a gypsy curse, perform at Albert's Hall in Toronto, June 2 and 3.

If you take in a Romaniacs' concert, sit back and enjoy the music and comedy - but don't believe anything they tell you.

—Myron Joseph King Romaniac (also known as Calvin Cairns) apparently spent his youth in central Saskatchewan before touring the world under an alias.

—Steffy Levine Romaniac (also known as Steven Bengtson) grew up in New Jersey. He claims he was found in swaddling clothes near New CBC-TV officials are delighted with the response to Spitting Image, an outrageous British comedy series that made its North American debut a few weeks ago.

Spitting Image, which features puppet caricatures of prominent personalities, is political satire at its best.
