

Highland dancers came in all sizes Saturday when Georgetown hosted the 13th Annual Highland Games. These youngsters were nervously going over their routines before having to take the stage and come under the critical eye of the judge in their respective events.

A real HIGHLAND Fling

It was difficult to go anywhere near the fairgrounds Saturday without hearing the drone of the bagpipes throughout the entire day. Here, 12-year-old Thomas Munroe of Scarborough, comes under the watchful eye of the judge in competition for the Grade 2 Pìobaireachd category.

It wasn't merely the swing of the kilts in the Highland Games competitions Saturday. The jig and reel were also popular with the crowds, and drew a wide field of competitors.

The Lorne Scots took part in the Highland Games celebration with a demonstration at the Army building at the fairgrounds. Here, Sgt. Alex McKelvey of the Lorne Scots introduces Robbie Stehlik, 8, to some of the firepower at the regiment's disposal.

Herald photos by Mike Turner

The Georgetown Girls Pipe Band took part in the competitions of the Highland Games, competing in Grade 4, against

Harvey Barkauskas of Lambeth (above) took his time preparing for the heavyweight events at the Highland Games, while Kevin Woylaz (below, left) and Doug Hitchon, both of Branford, check out the competition

Don't let the name fool you. Harvey Barkauskas of Lambeth was in the thick of competition in the heavyweight division of the Highland Games. Here, he prepares for his release in the hammer throw.

11 other bands. Here, two pipers, concentrate during their band's competition.