Jack Layman is back with his steam engines

Building model steam engines is a popular hobby, especially with many older participants fondly caring for original and antique machinery that they used in their day, and Jack Layman can fill the need for that customer.

The retired machinist began the hobby just before retiring from Chubb's security in Brampton eight years ago. Now he makes the steam engines by himself, and Mr. Layman and his products have attended Pioneer Days in Georgetown since its inception.

"The steam engines are table models of mill engines used in factories years ago," he said.

One of the steam engines Mr. Layman will demonstrate, is the James Watt engine which dates back to 1840. James Watt was a British instrument maker. "A lot of people think Watt developed the steam engine, but they were using steam before he was born," said Mr. Layman. "He just improved upon it."

In Mr. Layman's basement, he keeps the lathe, drill press, small milling machine and small shaper used to build these models. "I do the machining. It keeps me away from the television," he joked.

Mr. and Mrs. Layman belong to the Ontario Steam and Antique Preservers Association and to similar organizations in the Niagara and Georgian Bay areas. They frequently travel around to steam shows around Ontario and the United States. "You could be out every weekend from now to freeze out, between Ontario and U.S. shows," Mr. Layman said.
