There's many rewarding moments in this profession, and I'd be hard pressed to relate to you on a scale of 1 - 10 where everything fits in, but certainly amongst the highest on the scale, is being asked to evaluate a home that has been wonderfully taken care of. We see the total spectrum every week, from homes in bad repair, to homes that have been lovingly attended to since the owners have moved in. It is the homes that have been loved that give me a feeling of elation as I walk through them to give a market price. As you improve upon your home, it starts to sparkle and talk to prospective purchasers. People see that you care about your investment and are more willing to pay a little extra for that home, because they know that in all likelihood there won't be the need for repairs, major updating and decorating the moment they move in the door.

It is difficult, sometimes, to get people to understand that they will usually get back most of what they put into a home. I can't tell you that it will be dollar for dollar in all cases, but on the overall average, it will be reflected in the end price.

I have had the opportunity of inspecting three beautiful homes in the last 10 days, and all of them have been beautifully cared for. Each home is totally different, in different locations in town, and each of them stands on its own merits. However, all of them have had proud owners that have spent time and money in keeping their homes up to date and cared for. What a treat it is to be able to tell these owners that their home is worth extra dollars - and you know, it is usually these people that are the ones that least expect it. It is quite often the people that have done nothing to their homes that can't understand why their price isn't higher.

I guess the object of this article is to tell you that it is well worth it to keep updating, decorating and improving upon your investment. Your home is truly your insurance for the future, and you can't go wrong with keeping it looking its best. Most of our sales representatives in town will help you make some decisions about what are the most important things to do first, if you are undecided, but you can also keep up to date by reading home improvement magazines, going to the home shows and even walking through the paint and wallpaper shops for decorating ideas.

Keep at it, you will find it well worth your effort when you sell.
