Bevatron Celebrates

The Bevatron—the machine that made Berkeley, California, the undisputed world center of experimental physics in the nineteen fifties and sixties—celebrated its 30th anniversary.

The Bevatron is a particle accelerator—a circular racetrack in which powerful magnets guide subatomic particles along a journey of a quarter of a million miles in a little over a second.

At the end of their trip, the particles are moving close to the speed of light and have acquired enough energy to overcome nuclear forces and create forms of matter that have never existed on earth before.

The Bevatron is actively engaged in research, with a varied, full-time program of nuclear science and cancer research.
