BRIDGE

JAMES JACOBY

In a sense, bridge has a double standard where larceny and chicanery are involved. It is a violation of the proprieties and ethics of the game to exhibit a false emotion that might misguide your opponent. Deliberate hesitations that might convey information to partner are absolutely taboo, and false hesitations meant to persuade declarer or defender that you hold a particular card are reprehensible. But it is perfectly OK to play a deceptive card or even a falsecard that may persuade your opponent that you have something different from your actual holding.

In today's deal, West led a normal six of hearts against three no-trump. Declarer South could certainly win the queen and get to dummy with a club to try the diamond finesse. But if that lost, it would be easy for West to switch to spades and take enough tricks to set the contract. So, sacrificing an overtrick, South made a deceptive play — he won East's jack of hearts with his ace, concealing his queen. He played a club to dummy's jack and led the jack of diamonds, losing to West's king. Does anyone really blame West for leading another heart to his partner's presumed queen? Declarer of course now won the queen and made his overtricks after all.

This and other interesting strategies are explored in "The Bridge Book — Vol. 3 — For Advanced Players," available from Devyn Press, 151 Thierman Lane, Louisville, KY 40207.
