

Town considering widening Guelph Street

The town is considering widening Guelph Street in Georgetown and engineers are looking for your ideas on how to do it.

Halton Hills residents will get the chance Thursday night at a public meeting to hear various alternatives being considered by the town on how Guelph Street between Maple Avenue and Main Street should be widened.

The various alternatives being considered include widening the strip from two lanes to three, four or five lanes, said the town's manager of engineering services, Tim Stuart.

Another alternative Mr. Stuart said is not widening the road and only upgrading it.

Mr. Stuart couldn't say when construction on the strip would take place. He did say it was not part of the town's 1990 five-year capital budget forecast.

Thursday's meeting is one of two the town will hold this year to get input on how the alternatives would impact the businesses, schools, churches and residents along the strip, said Mr. Stuart. The next meeting is tentatively scheduled for some time in June.

Mr. Stuart said the cost of any construction won't be known until the second meeting.

The road widening is required, Mr. Stuart said, because of the current and future problems of traffic volume. He pointed to the long lines of cars on this strip of Guelph Street each day during the morning and late afternoon as proof that improvements to the road are needed.

And as Halton Hills expands and more drivers use Guelph Street, the strip will need to be expanded to prevent traffic collisions, said Mr. Stuart.

The town is currently finalizing plans to expand the stretch of Guelph Street from Mountainview Road to Maple Avenue, from four lanes to five lanes. The expansion will reduce the number of vehicle collisions that happen along this part of Guelph Street, said Mr. Stuart.
