

Canadians dialing London must dial new numbers

The telephone dialing code for London, England will change on May 6. Canadians calling London will no longer dial 1, the current city code. British Telecom has announced that this code will be replaced by 71 for inner London, and 81 for outer London.

The new city codes will double the available telephone numbers in London to 10 million. London, a global communications centre, needs more numbers to accommodate the growing use of fax machines and Direct Dialling In (DDI), a system which allows businesses to have individual telephone numbers instead of extensions.

On and after May 6, Canadian callers will dial 011 (international code), 44 (United Kingdom country code), 71 or 81 (new London city code), plus the seven digit number.

Teleglobe Canada, Canada's international carrier, and Telecom Canada, the association of Canada's major telephone companies, are working closely with British Telecom to communicate the change. Canadian callers using the old code on May 6 and after will have their calls intercepted and an announcement will then provide the correct codes.

Those callers who get through to London on the old code will hear a recorded announcement providing the correct code. For example, someone calling Heathrow airport, in outer London, with the old 44 1 code will hear: "The London area code 1 has been changed to 81 for the number you have dialled. Please redial, replacing 44 1 with 44 81."

Canadian businesses with equipment programmed for London numbers - modems, switchboards, computers, faxes - will need to make the appropriate adjustments before the May 6 changeover. Telex networks are unaffected by the code change.

The correct new codes are determined by the first three numbers, or exchange code, of the seven-digit London number, not by clear-cut geographic boundaries.

The 71 area (inner London) covers a circle of about 13 kilometres in diameter centred from Trafalgar Square, plus part of the Docklands area to the east. The new 81 area (outer London) comprises the remainder of what was previously the 1 area.

Other cities, including New York, Boston, Chicago, Geneva, Zurich and Hong Kong, have recently expanded their available numbers through new codes or re-numbering. Country-wide changes to numbering were made in France in 1985, and in Denmark in 1989.
