Planning mid-life crisis

shared the tale of woe with another instructor. He just sighed tragically.

A few days earlier, it seems, he had mentioned Paul McCartney to one of his classes. There had been a similar, blank-faced silence, until someone exclaimed, "Oh right - he was the guy who used to play with Wings."

Lately, my crisis has been growing worse. The other day, a group of us 30-something guys were having a beer with a callow 24-year-old who proceeded to tell us a disgustingly tasteless joke.

"What, he asked, "would you call 10 rabbits hopping backwards in a row?" He paused and then giggled, "A receding hare-line."

Naturally, this joke fell with a resounding clang. Eyes narrowed wrathfully. And I came to the dire realization - I have reached the age at which there is NOTHING funny about receding hairlines.

But all of this raises the disturbing question. If men spend years going through mid-life crisis ... is it possible that there isn't such a thing as mid-life crisis at all?

Is it possible we're just talking about the general state of angst which afflicts men for most of their lives? In short, is "mid-life crisis" nothing more than a fancy-dance name which has been applied to a much more general male tendency - otherwise known as "being a weenie"?

If so, this probably wouldn't surprise many women.

But then, not much ever does.
