OUR LANGUAGE

by Jeffrey McQuain

Something made from or containing oil may be OLEIC ("oh-LEE-ik"). For a wealthier vocabulary, you can strike it rich with adjectives such as OLEIC.

GIMCRACK refers to something that's showy but useless. Break this noun after its first syllable, and you'll find the CRACK in GIMCRACK.

Q. What do computer users mean by ON-LINE? I've been seeing that a lot lately.

A. In computer lingo, ON-LINE describes equipment that's in communication with or directly controlled by a main computer. Equipment that's OFF-LINE, on the other hand, is independent, not directly connected to the main computer. Perhaps these terms hark back to the old days of railroading, when something ON-LINE was located "on the line" — that is, convenient to the tracks for train service.

OUR LANGUAGE AD-VICE: A chain of appliance stores offers a powerful entry for the latest Ad-Vice Award. The chain, which sells products made by various manufacturers, advertises these appliances "all with full manufacturer's warranties." MANUFACTURER'S, with the apostrophe before the S, is the possessive form for only one manufacturer. To form the plural for more than one, place the S before the apostrophe, and you'll plug into the proper possessive: MANUFACTURERS'.
