Christmas photographs

For many parents, the annual trip to have youngsters' pictures taken with Santa helps make Christmas complete.

Tripods are now being set up next to Santa's red velvet thrones in malls and stores across Canada, in preparation for the annual hordes of children.

But parents planning to keep any professionally-taken photo as a long-term momento of Christmas 1990 should carefully consider quality before they buy.

"Consumers should review their options when purchasing photographic services," says Marilyn Gurevsky of the Ontario Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations. "Look at some samples of the work, and compare quality and price before deciding on a particular photographer."

If all you're interested in is a cute picture to show the family at Christmas dinner, the inexpensive department-store shot may be the answer. But, the quick and easy solution may have some drawbacks.

"With most low-cost photos it may be impossible to get quality reprints," says Gurevsky. This can lead to a lot of disappointed grandparents."

Some pictures with Santa are taken by photographers who use better-quality equipment. The packages offered often include one or two large prints and several wallet-size photos, which can generally be picked up a few days after the pictures are taken. Quick service may prove a benefit to parents who want to mail pictures to distant relatives or friends. But, there can be drawbacks to these photo packages, too. One results from the large number of children having their pictures taken. The .scne, lighting, and camera adjustments will be set up so all pictures will be acceptable. But little individual attention is possible, and shots may not be as flattering to some children as their parents had hoped. A second problem is that the buyer has no opportunity to see a proof of the photo before deciding on the size of the order. If the subject blinks just as the shutter is released, you can end up with photos you don't want.

Parents who decide to forgo Santa's smile in the picture and have a quick turn-around studio series of photos taken instead should shop around for the best deal.

Inexpensive studio packages usually involve a limited number of poses. The photographer chooses one shot and has it reproduced in a number of sizes, usually ready within two weeks. But the buyer who wants prints of other shots that were taken at the same sitting may be in for a surprise when the final price is quoted. Most department-store studios will arrange to have a full set of proofs prepared for the customer's approval. This service usually involves a considerable extra fee, however. For example, one national chain offers a specially priced children's package of four Christmas-setting poses. The photographer chooses the best shot and prepares approximately 20 prints in various sizes, at a cost of about $20. But if all four shots are developed and printed, the special offer no longer applies and the price rises to as much as $130.

Consumers interested in buying any but same-day photo services should make sure they carefully review the contract before they sign.

Remember that the negatives will remain the property of the photographer. Under federal law, the copyright to the negatives is theirs. If you think you may want extra copies of the prints made later, check to see how long the photographer keeps them on file.
