Halton Region Museum Planning Exhibit on Infectious Diseases

On Sunday, May 19, from 12 p.m. to 4 p.m., the Halton Region Museum invites visitors to an Open House to view two new exhibits. Plague to AIDS: Lessons from Our Past, and AIDS: Halton's Response examine society's response to infectious disease, from the bubonic plague during the Middle Ages up to the present struggle with the disease commonly known as AIDS. The Plague to AIDS exhibit is on loan from the Museum of the History of Medicine in Toronto. The exhibit entitled AIDS: Halton's Response, is produced by the Halton Region Museum. The exhibits will be on display until October 14th.

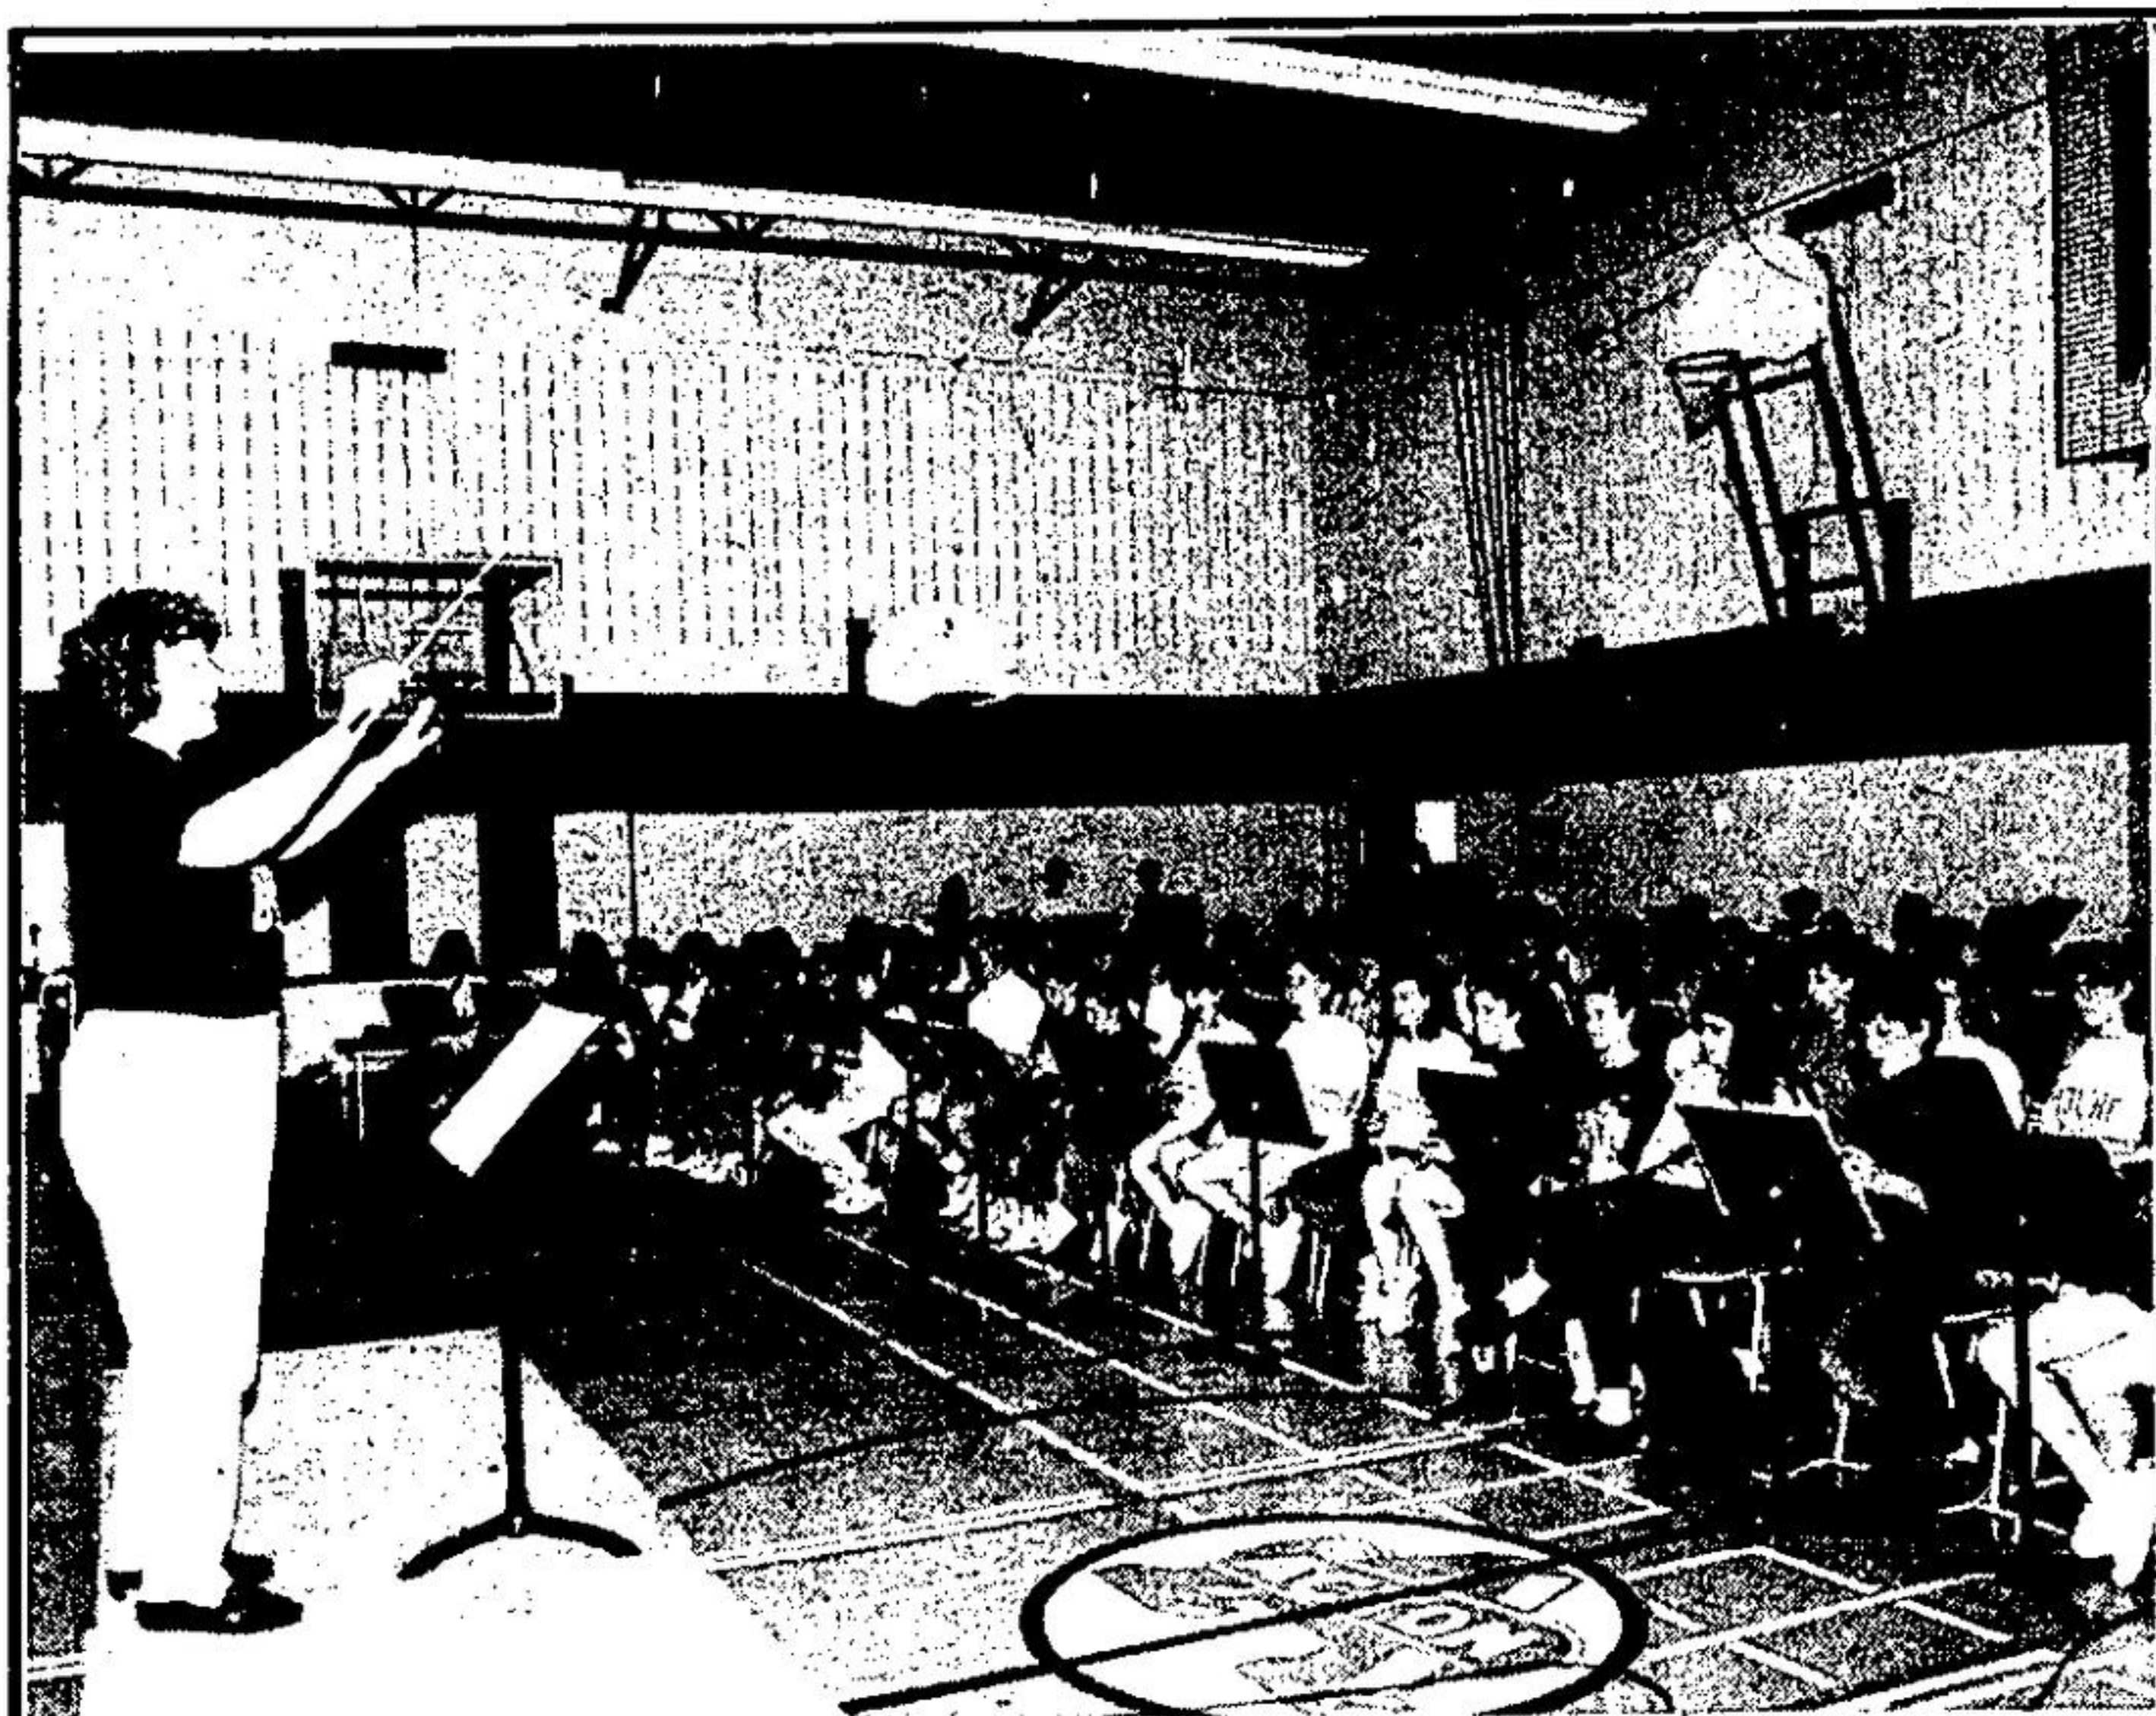

In the past, infectious diseases were thought to be transmitted by bad vapours, called miasmas. One of the ways people protected themselves during times of plague was by carrying pomanders filled with aromatic herbs and spices. Typical of this approach was the use of protective masks, fashioned in the form of bird "beaks", worn by Italian and French doctors during the 17th and early 18th centuries. These masks contained aromatic substances to counteract the miasmas believed to spread plagues. Similarly, the long robes worn by doctors were coated with an aromatic paste to prevent penetration by the sticky vapours.

Prior to the invention of vaccines and immunization, infectious diseases generated fear and hysteria as they decimated entire communities. Reactions to these diseases included both traditional healing methods and panic-driven behaviors such as the imposition of rigid quarantines and blaming scapegoats as the cause.

Plague to AIDS: Lessons from Our Past compares social reactions to infectious diseases in the past with contemporary attitudes towards the disease known as AIDS. It also demonstrates how such reactions can be detrimental to public education about the disease. Both exhibits, including Halton's analysis of the AIDS dilemma in AIDS: Halton's Response (developed in conjunction with the Halton Regional Health Department), are designed to heighten public awareness of the complex social and medical issues surrounding this disease.

Music In Motion Concert

Talk about a wall of sound. Stewarttown Public School teacher Lois Barranger leads approximately 200 North Halton public school music students in a rehearsal of a piece entitled "Name Those Tunes", in the afternoon of April 30 at Acton High School in preparation for the "Music in Motion" concert held that night at the high school. The show involves music students from the following schools:

Mackenzie-Smith Middle School, Stewarttown Public School, Centennial Middle School, all of Halton Hills and W. I. Dick Middle School of Milton and Kilbride Public School in Burlington. During the first half of the event, each school band performed a piece. The second half included all students joining together as a massed band. (Herald photo)
