Listen and learn

Have you ever watched a dog owner yell "come here!" to an unleashed puppy who has discovered a delightfully smelly bone? Do your young athletes sometimes seem to have the same disinclination to listen?
 The secrets to getting children (and puppies) to listen attentively lie in the reasons they often don't listen. They tend not to listen when they:
 *are busy doing something interesting
 *are watching something unrelated to accompanying sounds
 *have to be still for a long time
 *are being yelled at or criticized
 *don't understand what is going on
 *have not yet learned respect
 Other hints lie in an analysis of what is happening when they do listen. Why do they listen to television? Why do they listen to their "heroes"?
 Evolving from these points, here are some way to get athletes to listen attentively:
 *establish a signal which means "Come. See. Listen."
 *show them what you want, using words only as highlights
 *be concise, so they can quickly become active again
 *use simple language and speak clearly
 *lower your voice to the point where everyone can just hear
 *ask if they can all hear
 *look in turn at different athletes as you speak
 *be positive. Praise your athletes for what they do right, tell them how to improve, encourage them *say the same thing with your body and expression as you say with your voice.
 How do you know whether, and what, your athletes hear? Ask them. Then watch them!
