

Strawberry

fields... forever

Story by Andrew HInd
Photos by Sandra Traversy

Strawberry season is upon us, which means delicious red berries ripe for the picking.

Strawberries have a way of bringing many small communities together; the strawberry supper or picnic is an annual tradition in many rural villages, a sort of communal celebration of the season. The onset of strawberry season is eagerly anticipated, as much for the festivities as the sweet, delicious taste of the fruit.

The appeal of freshly-picked strawberries goes beyond rural villages, though. Increasingly, people living urban lifestyles are embracing the concept of fresh, locally-grown produce. They realize that in-season fruits and vegetables, which haven't been shipped over hundreds of miles, taste better, are healthier, and leave a smaller carbon footprint on the planet.
