

Gymnastics equals healthy kids

Life-long habits develop at a young age, therefore if children are physically active at an early age they will carry the concept of a healthy lifestyle with them throughout their life.

Children preschool-aged to primary grades need the foundations of quality physical programming taught by phys-ed specialists and coaches, just as teachers specialize in teaching math or science to ensure the proper form and movement is taught.

Gymnastics is one of the very few sports that use every part of the body. Recreational gymnastics teaches all the foundations of movement that complement every other sport and activity they take part in throughout life. It allows children that may be weaker, overweight, or less coordinated to progress at their own rate, unlike team sports where they may be centred out.

All children can benefit from gymnastics as it incorporates strength, flexibility, balance, coordination, spatial orientation, and power.

Studies have also shown the benefits that gymnastics has for some autistic children. Gymnastics allows them to get necessary activity and exercise while maintaining a sense of control over excessive stimulation.

Many gymnastics centres offer programming for children with special needs whether it's private training or small group format. Occasionally funding they receive from various different organizations can be used to subsidize their participation in gymnastics.

Gymnastics not only keeps children physically active and healthy, but it increases a child's self-esteem. It gives children confidence as they progress their skills at an individual level. They do not need to impress their peers as they would have to in many team sports.

The confidence they gain by doing gymnastics is carried with them in other areas such as school, peer groups, other sports, and overall life. With an increased confidence level children do not risk developing a low self esteem early on in life which can lead to more serious mental and physical health problems in their future.

It's also a known fact that active kids do better in school than sedentary kids.
