Giving 'green' at Christmas

Packed parking lots. Competition for the hottest toy. Frantic crowds. Hundreds of dollars spent. Somewhere along the way, Christmas became associated with stress and materialism instead of peace and simplicity. The move to "go green" not only helps the environment, but your wallet and sense of well-being too.

Here's how to contribute and give gifts of substance:

Service coupons. Use your skills to help someone else. Offer to babysit, teach someone to dance, fix a car, set up a computer, or paint a garage.

Make-your-own. Creative gifts from scratch may take time and energy, but they are often remembered more than store-bought items. Ideas include: baked cookies in a reusable tin, a handmade card, knitted scarf, a painting you did yourself, or a personalized scrapbook.

Honouring others. Charitable donations educate the recipient on the needs of the world while making a valuable contribution to a cause. Organizations like Christian Children's Fund of Canada let you purchase useful items like: a child's first books, fruit tree, clean water well, or emergency food basket through its online gift catalogue. You can purchase a gift in the name of your recipient and feel good about making a difference.

Keep green thoughts flowing. Giving green doesn't have to end with you. You can encourage others to be green-minded by giving fancy recyclable bags, tree-planting kits, reusable coffee tumblers, and fair-trade products. Just remember to wrap your items in a reusable gift bag or recyclable paper.
