Playground expansion gets go-ahead

The Rotary Club of Georgetown's proposal to expand the Dominion Gardens Park playground with universally accessible play equipment was approved in principle by Town council at its Dec. 16 meeting.

The $125,000 expansion will be funded by the Rotary Club, which will work with Town staff on the final design and construction of the playground equipment for children with varying disabilities.

It will include an expansion of about 2,400 sq. ft., including two new ramps, four deck components, seven play panels and five independent play components, plus a rubberized safety base.

Depending on when the Rotary Club can get its funding—the group plans to seek grants and corporate donors—construction will occur in the spring or fall so as not to interfere with the summer play season.

The rubberized safety base would create an ongoing cost to the Town of about $1,500 a year for regular maintenance and a future replacement cost of about $35,000.

Town staff will report back to council with a management agreement, detailing operating budget impacts and design costs.
