

What's Cookin': Maritimes provides exciting culinary adventure

Gerry is writing today...

Cod tongues, lobster zuppa, toutons, bakeapples, lobster rolls, salt cod cakes, oatcakes, fresh mussels, pan fried cod and chips, lots of haddock and fisherman's breevies, yep, that's what I was eating last month! Can you guess where I was? In the Maritimes, of course!

What an exciting new culinary adventure this was for us. I didn't like everything I tried, but in aid of research, I tried it all! As well as eating all the local fare, we sought out local seafood purveyors, processors and growers. I have never seen so many lobster traps!

Although we spent time in P.E.I., Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, I couldn't say where the best lobster was (anywhere from $17 to $35). I did eat fresh whole lobster five times and lobster rolls three times. Yummy! McDonald's even has a McLobster roll, which I never did get around to trying.

I didn't realize how huge this seafood industry was until we saw it in action. We drove by many mussel and oyster farms, watched a huge catch of some kind of fish being unloaded and iced and containerized for shipping and saw hundreds of fishing vessels in all the little fishing village harbours. We talked with some fishermen on the south shore of Nova Scotia who were unloading their catch of hake and pollock from the Bay of Fundy. They were out one week to fill their boat and were going to salt it before selling.

We saw McCain foods and the huge Cavendish Farms in P.E.I. as well as Highliner's processing plant in Lunenburg, N.S. In Oxford, N.S. we came across North America's largest processor of wild blueberries (Oxford was the name of the company). As we were leaving the Annapolis valley in N.S., home of apple orchards, vegetable farms and vineyards, I stopped at a market and loaded up with the best of their crops, as we were going to be staying where we could cook in for a few days.

Seeing and being close to the source of some of the foods we eat is a real sense of enjoyment and interest for us, having been in the food business. Kind of a Mother Earth type of feeling.

Watch for another story or two on our Maritime experiences. Have fun and keep cooking!
