Different models, different methods

The way you install a new hearth or woodstove varies greatly, depending on the model you choose. The installation of an electric fireplace is very simple, as it only needs to be plugged into an electrical outlet. An electric or ethanol fireplace does not require a chimney or a ventilation pipe, so some models can be affixed directly to the wall while others are portable and do not require any assembly.

Many safety regulations must be followed when putting in a wood fireplace, however. If your home already has a hearth and chimney, you can install a fireplace insert, but it must include a new, officially approved stainless steel chimney lining. Ensure that your chimney is suited to the type of fireplace you want and that its installation meets building codes. If you have chosen an advanced combustion fireplace, be sure to hire a competent professional to install it.

A gas fireplace doesn't require a chimney, just an evacuation pipe or duct. You will, however, need to replace the existing chimney lining with an approved metal duct. Insert models are simply placed in the opening of an existing fireplace. For those homes that do not have an existing fireplace, a zero clearance fireplace can be installed on an interior or exterior wall with approved venting material. Again, a natural gas or propane fireplace should be installed by a home heating professional.

Wood pellet stoves require an evacuation pipe rather than a chimney, and a simple vent is sufficient for some models. It is always advisable to have this type of fireplace installed by a licensed contractor familiar with the procedure.
