Wife assault action programs being stressed

Action against wife assault will become a permanent part of Ontario government programs, Anne Swarbrick, Minister Responsible for Women's Issues, announced at the start of November which is Wife Assault Prevention Month.

"I strongly believe that one of the greatest barriers to women's equality is the continuing threat of violence—and society's continuing tolerance of this violence," said Ms. Swarbrick.

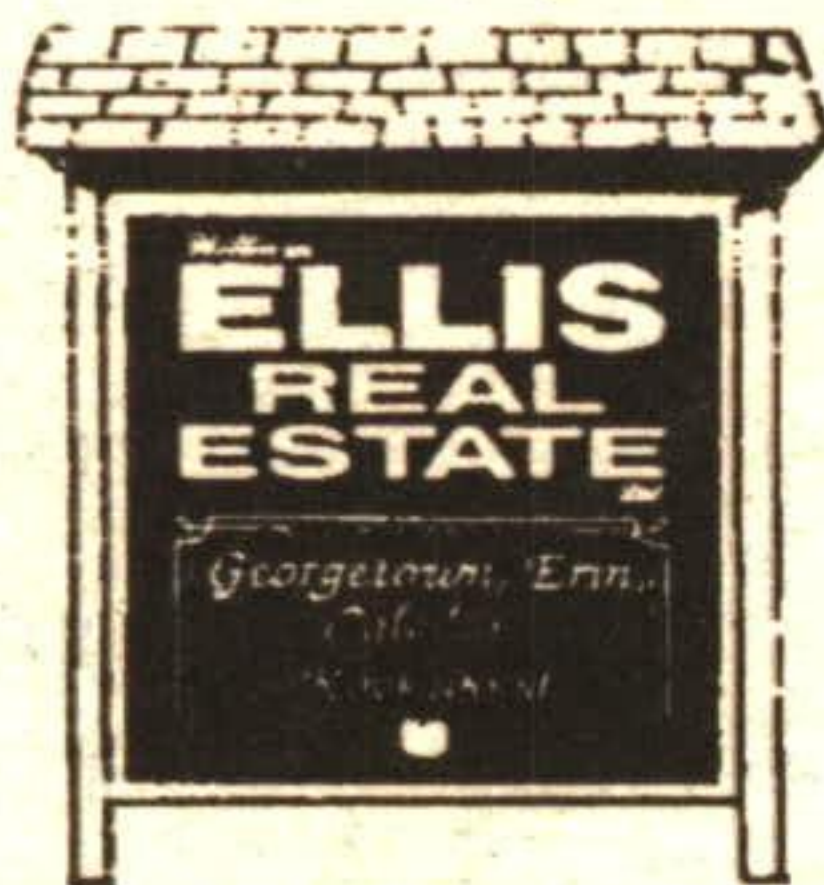

"Even within our own homes women are not safe, which is why this Ontario government is committing itself on a permanent basis to the issue of wife assault. Changing public attitudes towards this serious crime is crucial."

Conservative estimates indicate that at least one in eight women is assaulted by her spouse or partner, and almost half of assaults result in physical injury.

Recent research undertaken by the Ontario Women's Directorate shows that, since its inception in 1984, the public education campaign against wife assault has helped to change opinions.

"However, in spite of evidence to the contrary, most people still believe that personal problems, alcohol, or drugs cause domestic violence," said Ms. Swarbrick.
