Problems linger after 401-Tremaine accident

By PAUL DORSEY

A traffic accident that shut down Hwy. 401 for six hours could have a far longer effect on businesses and motorists who use Tremaine Rd. a lot.

Milton Councillor Bill Johnson said Wednesday he's already been contacted by business people who are losing income while the Tremaine overpass over the 401 stays shut. It was damaged in a Nov. 29 accident.

Johnson wants the Ontario Ministry of Transportation to approve a plan to open a single lane on the overpass. Ministry and Region staff met on the bridge Tuesday with that in mind, but concern lingers over snow clearing operations and traffic safety.

Public Works Commissioner Bruce Kitchen told Regional committee members Wednesday there's a trucking firm immediately south of the bridge. The overpass should be opened for all traffic or none, he said.

While the partial reopening is still under consideration, permanent repairs to the overpass won't begin until spring, when concrete can be poured.

Calling any business loss claims the Province's problem, Burlington Councillor Pat McLaughlin advocated leaving the overpass closed until all risk is removed.

A 20-tonne roll of steel smashed into one of the bridge's vertical supports when it was thrown from an eastbound transport truck that overturned on the 401 Nov. 29.

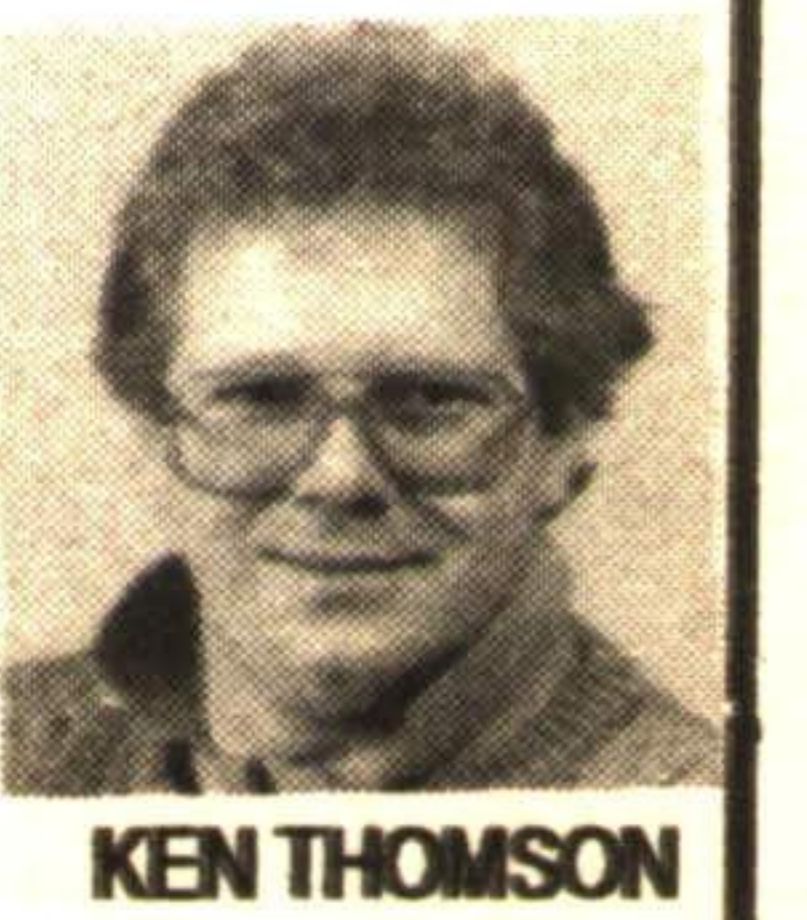

The highway was closed in both directions for six hours while debris was cleaned up. Rerouted traffic clogged Campbellville, Derry and Britannia Rds. and 15 Sdrd. All must be assessed for damages, for which the Province would have to pay Halton.
