

Know where there's a Great Blue Heron colony? OHI wants to know

The Ontario Heronry Inventory (OHI), a project of the Long Point Bird Observatory (LPBO), is seeking volunteers to help with the final year of a two-year, province-wide survey of Great Blue Heron colonies.

As in 1990, the OHI in 1991 will be compiling a catalogue of the locations of all heronries in Ontario. In addition the OHI is hoping to "census" (count nests within a colony) as many as 300 heronries.

In a province the size of Ontario, the contributions of volunteers are vital to the success of a project of this magnitude. If you know the location of a heron colony, or are interested in participating in colony censuses, please contact Bev Collier, Ontario

Heronry Inventory, Long Point Bird Observatory, P.O. Box 160, Port Rowan, On, N0E 1M0, 519-586-3531.

Anyone providing a colony's location will be gratefully acknowledged; volunteers interested in censusing will be sent further information and instructions on how to participate.

In 1980-81, LPBO conducted a similar survey and determined that the heron population in Ontario was healthy, with over 375 active colonies. However, the ensuing 10 years have seen increasing pollution of lakes and streams, disturbance of nesting sites, acid precipitation, wetland drainage, woodlot cutting and continues human development in more and more remote regions. LPBO wants to quantify changes in the distribution and abundance of herons in the province resulting from these human impacts.

The Great Blue Heron, standing over a metre tall, with a wing span of almost two metres, is one of our largest and most majestic birds. Herons nest in colonies of two to as many as 300 pairs, often in isolated woodlots, where they build large stick nests. Many are inhabitants of the Halton Hills area.

The Long Point Bird Observatory is an independent, non-profit organization dedicated to studies promoting the conservation of birds and their habitats.
