Posture - The Link Between Stance and Grip!

Grip and stance are two very important components of the starting position in golf - components that I've discussed in the past two weeks. Now it's time to discuss posture. A player's posture is the framework of your swing. It will affect extension, arc, the plane of your swing and most important of all...balance.

Demonstrated in the first photo, the proper posture has balance, is angular, has room to swing and is relaxed. The chin is up (thinking tall), the shoulders are down and relaxed, the bend is from the hips and the knees are slightly flexed. Notice that the body's weight should be evenly distributed between your heels and toes. Many times, I will suggest to students that they feel the ground with their feet!

Finally, pay close attention to your arms and hands. Are they suspended directly below your shoulders? You do not want your hands to be either inside or outside your shoulder line. The correct arm extension, "at address," is very important in hitting a "solid" ball.

The second photograph shows the most common misinterpretation of posture that I see all too often. The shoulders are high and the hands are outside the shoulder line. Beware golfers! You may be setting yourself in this posture to accommodate clubs that are not fitted to you. This is especially true when referring to length and lie.

Now is a good time to discover whether your clubs are fitted properly because posture as shown in the second photo will be the cause of numerous compensating movements throughout your swing.

As a reminder - your posture is your only link between your stance and grip. All three are important components of the starting position. You, like many other golfers, may fail to realize that faulty posture will greatly affect your ability to contact the ball solidly thus affecting the success of your entire swing.

Tip of the Day!
When playing fairways that have been soaked with water... "think tall" and shorten up on the club so that you don't hit the ball fat!
