

Swinging Fore...

"DEAD-SOLID, PERFECT!"
With SHELLEY WOOLNER
BSGC Head Pro

Your ability to concentrate throughout an entire game of golf can be the one key to more consistent shot making that you may have overlooked. Perhaps it's time to find yourself a trigger to initiate your pre-swing routine in order to help you focus more effectively. Even though a golf game may last four to five hours, you only have to concentrate for approximately 45 seconds on each shot. Depending on how many shots you've taken on a given day, this doesn't take a lot of time.

I'm sure that we have all experienced those moments where, after hitting a shot which appeared simple at the time, we find ourselves asking, "What was I thinking of?" Who knows? Maybe you were discussing business, strategically planning your next move in the stock market, still steaming over last night's ball game or planning a party for this coming weekend! To find your concentration - It's definitely time for a trigger!

Triggers can be anything, and normally a simple mannerism will do. Whether it be tipping your hat, fixing your glasses or tightening the velcro on your glove, choose one with which you are most comfortable.

Tipping my visor is the trigger that I rely on to initiate my pre-swing routine. After choosing a club and standing behind the ball in order to determine an intermediate target, I adjust my visor and begin walking up into my address position. The trigger informed me that the next 45 seconds is going to be devoted to golf!

This may seem foolish to you, but it's worth a try. Pre-swing routines are even more important on days when your game is really inconsistent. Many golfers ignore their "golfing routines" when things are going poorly for them, yet this is the time when more concentration is necessary.

So pick a trigger this week. Even a smile can be effective! See if you can determine (spot) the triggers of the pros during the next PGA tournament. I know what Lee Trevino's is!
