selves homeless although the court-ordered eviction will wait until a ruling from a Municipal Board hearing that begins Feb. 24.

"We're living on a time bomb," she said, pointing out that trailer parks are intended as "stepping stones into the housing market," yet Halton Hills and the Credit Valley Conservation Authority are pressing for eviction without providing any new affordable housing.

Spence noted that the Town had new accommodations at Nor-Halton Park virtually arranged before neighbors there scuttled the plan, but Croft said she would have faced living costs of up to $2,200 a month at the site south of Acton.

It was moderator Len Landry who said he'd quite seriously advised the trailer park residents earlier in the week to seek "refugee status." Croft indicated she's not interested, but another woman called the idea "brilliant."

The residents continue to question the role of Georgetown South's developers in the Authority's decision to evict them because of the potential hazards of living on a floodplain downstream.

Asked by a 17 Sdrd. voter about "the circus called Country Video," Spence allowed that he was "not exactly pleased" with the Tarzwell application for a commercial rezoning of the Tenth Line industrial property. He preferred to approve it, however, so the Town can control its specific use through site plan requirements.

A questioner who said he's "sick and tired" of the many ratepayers' groups around town urged those elected this time to have the political will to stand by their intentions despite such protests.

"These protest groups are going 'round and 'round and 'round and nothing is getting done in this town," he said. "When you elect a council, you make a decision to let them govern."
