PLANTS TO LOOK UP TO

Some people may call them majestic, handsome or even towering giants. But there is no denying it, there exists some plants that are so tall, that you have to look up to them. Their height imparts a stately admiration. However, they would not be so widely appreciated if it wasn't for their flowers. Lofty perennials such as Foxgloves, Delphiniums, and Hollyhock all reach at least 6 feet in height and develop magnificent flowers.

Unfortunately the Foxglove is not perennial, it is biennial. That means that it develops a short rosette of foliage of season one year and bolts up to 8 ft. tall the next season and flowers. The latin name for Foxglove is Digitalis which refers to the individual flowers' resemblance to a finger or digit. Since Foxgloves perpetuate themselves from seeds each year they pop up in a different location - close to the mother plant, consequently they are not suitable for formally designed gardens. Foxgloves are best suited to country cottage gardens.

Delphiniums are a stately plant in many gardens. They make a perfect backdrop for other, shorter flowers or to hide an unwanted sight for the summer. Like most tall willow plants, delphiniums need to be stalked to ensure that they do not topple over. They perform best in full to partial sun and deep fertile, well-drained soil.

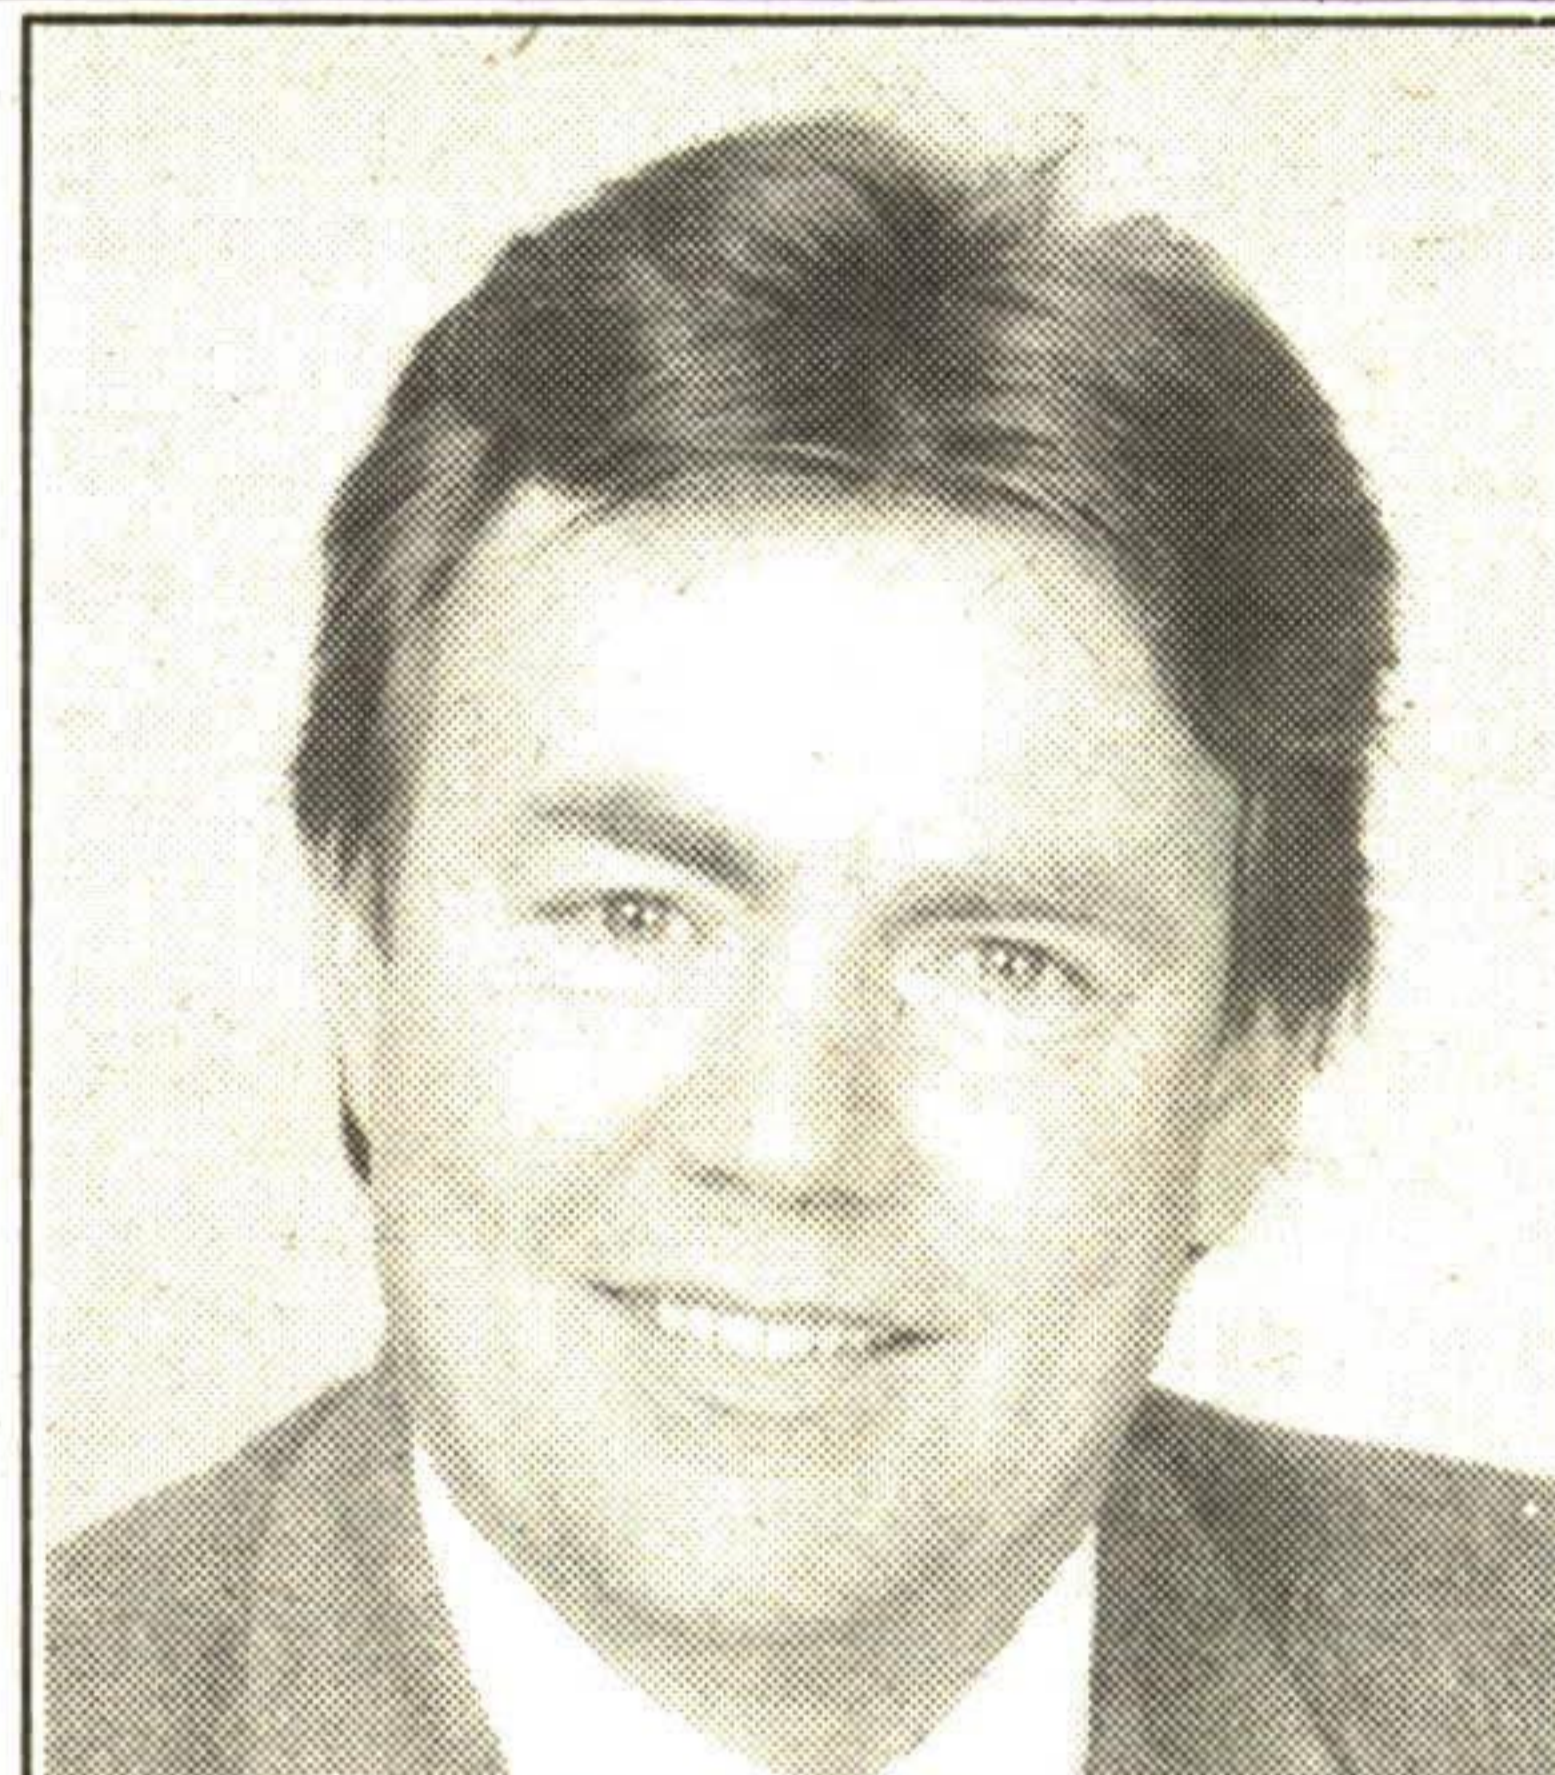

You must also look up to the 8 to 10 foot Hollyhocks. Their hibiscus-like flowers gently sway atop the tall spires of foliage from July to September. Hollyhocks can succumb to a bit of foliage rust. This can be discouraged by ensuring that there is sufficient air circulation around the plant.
