CRABGRASS - CAN IT BE CONTROLLED?

Yes, but it's not easy!

Crabgrass tends to grow near driveways, sidewalks and blvds. Control of Crabgrass is best done early in the spring, prior to the rooting of the Crabgrass seeds. Crabgrass seed germination occurs when the temperature of the soil surface reaches about 18°C (65°F).

Control of Crabgrass rooting will result following a timely, precise application of a recommended Crabgrass control material. This material forms a protective barrier on the soil surface which helps control the growing tips of Crabgrass seeds.

If the spring application is missed, a post-emergent treatment may be applied. This treatment is best applied when the Crabtree plants are very young. This application works on contact (rather than forming a protective barrier on the soil surface). Treating Crabgrass at this time can be very effective. It also allows for a "spot treatment" approach (treating only those areas which are infested). This reduces the necessity for blanket applications.

Once the Crabgrass is controlled, seeding the bare area may be necessary. It is also very important that the desirable lawn grasses be properly nourished with fertilizer. A thick healthy lawn will shade the soil surface to help control additional crabgrass seeds from surviving during the season.
