Phil's Basement

When my wife Em's cousin Hilton told us he was replacing his old summer cabin with a brand-new vacation home this summer, nobody could figure out why he was doing it. A bachelor, Hilton had never even used his old place much, although we usually took Kyle and Belinda up for a week or so every summer.

Anyway, Hilton's big secret was that he was building it for Em's whole clan to use. There seems to be another generation of ankle-biters starting up, so everybody was thrilled to bits about having a summer place to use. We went up recently to see how it's coming along, and Hilton was up there waiting for an inspector from The Hydro to arrive.

Hilton had done his homework and he knew that all wiring installations, including those done on renovations, whether they're in a home, or an office, or an industrial building, have to be inspected and certified that they measure up to the Electrical Safety Code in Ontario. The Hydro's inspectors have got years of experience in electrical construction, and the one who looked over Hilton's place was no exception.

The inspector was quite pleased to see that Hilton's contractor had also installed Ground Fault Circuit Interrupters (GFCIs). If there is an electrical ground fault in an appliance, for example, electrical current will flow instantly from that fault to the ground. If you happen to be holding on to that appliance at the time, the current can flow through you on its way down. Bad news. But a GFCI senses the fault and stops the flow of electric current before someone gets hurt. It's really a smart thing to have GFCI receptacles outdoors and in the bathrooms, laundry rooms and work shops.

Anyway, when Belinda grabbed her "Uncle Hillie" to give him a big thank-you hug, shy old Hilton muttered, "Useless thing, money. Spend it before you lose it, that's what I say." He quickly bent over to yank at some weeds - but not before we all saw the smile on his face.
