Smart Alick is rising star on local rock 'n' roll scene

By AARON HUGHES
Special to The Independent/Free Press

Rock 'n' roll is alive and well in Georgetown thanks to a young band who still plays the harder brand of music.

Their name is Smart Alick and they've been playing for five years now, on and off, at fairs, competitions and small gigs around town. At a recent Battle of the Bands, Smart Alick won five hours of recording time at Escarpment Studio and Sound. Band members are bassist, Michael Lee Stoker; drummer, Road Kill (Doug Staddon); lead guitarist, Lee Martin; rhythm, Todd Robinson and Phill Landriault.

Playing only cover (non-originals) songs at first, the band began to write their own material. With all five band members contributing to the writing of their new songs, an album is in the works and should be released in January or early February.

"It'll be a whole new wave of music," said Lee Martin, lead guitarist.

"It has everything from heavy metal to jazz."

Though this new wave of music has no name, the band hesitates to call it Alternative music because it is not quite the same thing — it is different from everything else.

The band had originally planned on going on tour last summer but experienced booking problems; instead they played six or seven small gigs around town. In spite of losing the tour the band is raising funds to complete the album and have it out by the new year.

Smart Alick can be seen playing Battle of the Bands, talent shows and several gigs around town.

With the title of the album not yet released and the style of music still to be named, the band has lots of potential on the music scene.
