Busy commercial career for Hazel Orange peels up her nose? No problem!

BY LISA TALLYN

having great fun.

"You meet some really interesting people," says Gorin.

HAZEL GORIN

Georgetown resident Hazel Gorin, looking rather glum, with orange peels stuffed up her nostrils, peers out from a page in the Reader's Digest August edition.

That is not Gorin's daily look. The vivacious 61-year-old put the peels in her nose and donned a frumpy dress and makeup for a Wampole advertisement that was shot in rural Bolton in May.

Since she signed with a Toronto agent about three months ago Gorin has managed to land a commercial for a U.S. shoe manufacturer as well as the Wampole ad.

Gorin, who has been involved in amateur theatre for about 20 years, says she is curler in her hair, sporting green eye shadow and bright red cheeks.

"The hardest part was walking into the room (with the others up for the part)," said Gorin.

After a call back Gorin's agent called her two days later to tell her she had got the part.

After her role in the bus commercial was shot Gorin headed across the city to audition for the part of a witch in another commercial. She dressed in a borrowed witch's costume, made up her face, and had to cackle while riding on a broom.

She doesn't seem concerned that she hasn't heard yet if she has the witch's role.

"You many never hear from them again. You have to learn how to accept rejection and not take it to heart," says Gorin.
