Revenue gained from carbon pricing should be used to cut taxes

Income taxes are the single biggest economic growth-killing, job-killing tax ever.

Q: Now I'm going to get into climate change. I understand you have a very interesting platform on combatting climate change. I know that there's a very strong environmental community within Wellington and Halton ... how does that influence what you're bringing to the table in terms of a climate change platform?

A: I've always listened to the views of my constituents when making decisions in Ottawa and the issue of environment and climate change is no different. I believe that we as a Conservative party need to have a credible plan to reduce emissions that's based on revenue-neutral carbon pricing that uses the power of free markets to achieve emission reductions.

Q: What is revenue-neutral carbon pricing?

A: It is a price on carbon where all the revenues generated by the government are used to cut taxes. It's the model that has been used in British Columbia. It is not the model that is being used in Ontario, Quebec or Alberta.

Q: Who do you feel is going to be the strongest contender that you're going up against?

A: I don't know, it's too early to tell. Everybody in the race I think is a contender. The race is still wide open.

Q: I understand the vote will be happening in May. What is your winter going to look like?

A: I'm doing two things between now and then. First and foremost, I'm continuing my job as a Member of Parliament, representing the people of Wellington-Halton Hills in Ottawa. Second thing I'll be doing is on weekends and in my spare time I'll be campaigning across the country talking to Canadians and Conservatives alike about our vision for the country.
