Another run for O Leary?

He mused aloud as to whether there was a way he could stay in the race but find a way to avoid winning, and to come only a close second, wrote Coates in the article. Those of us leading his campaign were stunned.

As the person who chaired Kevin's campaign, I've had more than a few questions about what happened. And while there has been much speculation about why he quit, at the end of the day it came down to one thing: he was never fully committed, he added.

O Leary seemed to sing a different tune while speaking to the IFP on the convention floor.

Oh yeah, I've got the bug for sure. I love this stuff, said O Leary, when asked if he might consider another crack at politics.

I'll get involved, I don't know where. But I want to get (Maxime) Bernier into power. Whatever I can do to help, he told the IFP on the convention floor on Saturday (May 27).

O Leary, who endorsed Bernier after pulling out of the race, was of course speaking before the shocking result that saw Saskatchewan MP and former opposition house leader, Andrew Scheer, become new party leader in surprising fashion.

Bernier was widely expected to win by pundits and pollsters.

O Leary contested Coates' claims while speaking to The Toronto Star on Saturday at the convention.

I would say that article is 50 per cent factual and 50 per cent interpreted, he told the Star. I think that's Mike's disappointment in having worked so hard, that's his interpreted view. I don't feel that way. If I thought I could win the election, I would've went the distance.

Despite pulling out of the race a month earlier, O Leary still managed to garner more votes than three other candidates with a 1.07-per-cent share of the first ballot count, based on early ballots mailed in by party members before his last-minute withdrawal.

O Leary's short-lived, four-month campaign saw the Dragons Den and Shark Tank star reach front-runner status in many polls, and a lot of people including Coates believed he could have won had he stayed in it.
