A local native who is spearheading a class-action lawsuit against the Club at North Halton says he feels the recent shareholder vote to not pursue a possible sale of the facilities bodes well for his side in upcoming court decisions.

Peter Noble filed a lawsuit in Ontario Superior Court against the century-old Georgetown club in May 2015, claiming the legal action is based on a number of issues, including that North Halton's current share exchange program is "a wealth transfer machine," resulting in economic loss to a group of 122 nongolfing and non-member shareholders.

The class action also asks the court that the ownership structure of for-profit the Club at North Halton, which operates a golf course, curling and dining facilities, be dissolved and its net assets distributed among all shareholders.

The club held a special shareholders' meeting on Oct. 4 to determine whether to entertain the best two offers - as determined by broker-of-record Colliers International - to sell the land and buildings, requiring a two-thirds majority vote to pass.

The final tally was 212 voting against and 206 for the sale of the club.

Noble said the process of soliciting offers through Colliers International confirmed that the
