Are you listening?

Can you hear what your car is telling you?

Yes, your car talks to you, and it's pretty important that you listen to it! Every machine emits sounds, which can be interpreted as a sort of language. You can learn a lot about your car's well-being by listening to it carefully.

Today's cars and trucks have much quieter engines than those of a few years ago. One consequence of this is that motorists are now compelled to depend more on dashboard displays for signs of problems. Unfortunately, many drivers tend to ignore these lights and dials. Because modern vehicles are tougher and better built than ever, the car might continue to work for a while, even if something is wrong or if a part is worn out. Ignoring these warning signs, though, might cause an accident, putting your life or someone else's in jeopardy.

So, when starting up and driving your car or truck, pay good attention to the sounds coming from the engine room and from the whole car itself. Abnormal sounds could be an indication of trouble in your engine, transmission, brakes, steering, or exhaust system. You might even hear some parts of the body telling you something is going wrong.

If your knowledge of all things mechanical is limited, the next time you start your car, concentrate on what it sounds like as it runs normally, in good condition. Then, if you later hear something abnormal, try your best to describe the sound and where it is coming from. Get your car to your local dealership or private garage as soon as possible and describe what you noticed to your mechanic.

Most of the time, your car will be whispering smooth sounds that make you happy and comfortable. But remember: as soon as you don't like a sound, have it checked. At the least, you might be saving money by preventing a small problem from developing into a major one.

Save your money.
