Story headline upsets reader

Dear editor,

I was very upset to see an article in the Dec. 19th edition of the newspaper, entitled "Teachers don't have to show up for PD day". As a retired teacher and an occasional supply teacher, I am not aware of the Professional Development or Professional Activity Days. However, when I first heard about this Professional Development Day on the last day before the Christmas break, I was surprised. It just didn't make sense. The public wouldn't see it as a day to better the education of their students, just as another easy day. Put it together with the opinion of many that teachers are underworked, overpaid and have the summer and three other weeks of holiday, it would just add to the justification of that opinion.

However, when I was in one of the secondary schools a couple of weeks ago, I asked about it and was told that it was a day without pay. Ok, I got it. Then you printed this article, which indeed did explain what the day really was. What I want to understand is why was the title used—to drum up interest? Some of your readers would just see the header and would jump to the conclusion it was suggesting and not even read the article. Not very responsible of your newspaper, in my opinion, and I am sure, to some of your readers who are also teachers.

Canada Post wastefulness could lead to a new business

Dear editor,

With the news that communal mail boxes will soon replace door to door delivery, I'm contemplating going into business, locally. The product? Selling second hand Canada Post elastic bands used by carriers to bundle mail before sorting. The great thing is that there's no cost for the product—they magically appear almost daily on the ground surrounding our own communal mailbox; three or four a day on some deliveries. Easily six hundred in a single year. I've been collecting them for a decade. Sensing I was onto an habitual behaviour, I once visited six other communal mailboxes in a 5 km radius. Four of them miraculously provided the same result. The opportunities to now expand, with Canada Post's recent announcement, are endless!

Feeling guilty and duty-bound, I returned a pailfull of them to the local supervisor at Canada Post many years ago. Since then, his office doesn't return my calls so we can have a little chat (and, of course, replenish their stock). Maybe they have enough elastic bands, don't need retreads, and responding to customers really isn't their thing!

I guess one has to be thankful that neighbours tirelessly pick up the discarded bands. Mind you, I don't much like the competition as I set about my new venture.

To those letter carriers at Canada Post who are diligent, caring and responsible and who wouldn't dream of littering our town, I am begrudgingly grateful. But you're really not helping my entrepreneurial cause.

Is MP's bill a new beginning?

Dear editor,

Kudos to our federal MP Michael Chong for taking on the PMO whose ceaseless efforts to appropriate political power and concentrate it amongst a handful of appointees surrounding the Prime Minister of Canada. I don't normally agree with Mr. Chong's politics but on this issue, I support him.

What will be interesting to watch is Stephen Harper's reaction to this challenge by the "Committee 2012"—a handful of MPs who are tired of being told what to think and when to say it. They are standing up to a system that successive PMOs have put in place to whip votes and push bills through Parliament with little or no chance of debate from its MPs effectively muzzling its members. Stephen Harper and his PMO have taken the practice to new heights.

I am becoming more and more drawn to the idea that Parliament should be composed of non partisan representatives (independents) in this first-past-the-post electoral system. A few good men or women to represent us, unencumbered by a system that has reduced politics to a blood sport.

We need a level playing field and Michael Chong's proposals take us one step closer to that goal. We could be witnessing the beginning of something truly interesting in Canadian politics if Mr. Chong can convince enough of his colleagues to vote for the bill with support from the opposition. We have not witnessed this independence from our MPs in a very long time.

Town will analyze response to ice storm

The ice storm of 2013 certainly walloped Halton Hills. It couldn't have come at a worse time, as families were making last minute Christmas plans. At one point, everyone in Town was without power. Rural roads that I travelled looked like a war zone. In Town, it was horrible to see so many trees on boulevards, in parks and on private property slumped over, badly damaged.

Staff from both Halton Hills Hydro and the Town worked long and tirelessly throughout the storm. This was a storm which many of us will be speaking of for years to come. This affected all of us and I'm very pleased at the way our community rallied together.

Throughout all of the devastation, we saw many countless acts of kindness. Late Christmas Eve, I visited the Gellert Community Centre which was designated as an evacuation centre. Volunteering organizations such as the Salvation Army and the Red Cross were helping residents at this time of need. The Acton Fire Station served as a warming centre. Our firefighters were great hosts as well as other Town staff. I heard many stories of people taking their neighbours into their own homes to help make them comfortable. Many people prepared and served hot meals to those in need; in addition to hydro crews working in difficult and frigid weather. Your town councillors were also very involved throughout the storm.

The many acts of kindness was yet another great example of small town living at its best. We will all learn from this experience. We will analyze how we responded and make necessary adjustments. I believe we are a stronger community as a result of this storm. Now more than ever is a good time to support our local businesses that were without power.

I invite everyone to come out to the Acton Winter Carnival on January 25 and 26 at Prospect Park in Acton. Lots of outdoor activities are being planned. This will be a lot of fun for the whole family, and it's free!
