Rescuing boats and young lives

Twelve-year-old Johnny Parcher and Jim Steeves strip paint from "GasHopper", a 1945 225 cu. inch class three point hydroplane during the Winter Workshop Event of the Antique and Classic Boat Society Toronto Chapter on Saturday. The event was held at the Kids & Classics Boatshops Museum, a community, volunteer boatshop in Glen Williams, where donated antique boats are being restored and kids-at-risk boatbuilding program takes place several times a season. The event introduced the community work to club members with reps from the Youth Services arm of the Ministry of Justice (Probation) on hand to say a few words about the results they have seen in local youth through this program. The rest of the day was hands-on work with boaters sharing their favourite techniques for boatbuilding and refinishing.

Several area residents made it clear to the Town of Halton Hills at a public information session last week they don't want their property listed on a Heritage Register.

Approximately 120 people were at the meeting at Mold-Masters Sportsplex Thursday evening to learn more about the Register—a listing of properties in town that have been identified of heritage value. The Town is proposing to add 357 properties to the Register, and the residents at the meeting had been notified that their properties are one of them.

Another session for affected property owners is scheduled for Feb. 27.

Ward 3 Councillor Moya Johnson, chair of Heritage Halton Hills, said the list is a requirement from the Provincial government.

"It's not something we decided to do, we had to do it," said Johnson.

She said being on the Register places no restriction on the property owner for anything they want to do to their house, except if they want to tear it down.

"The only restriction is you have to provide the Town 60 days notice if you have a wish to demolish the building," said Johnson.

During those 60 days, she said, the Town can decide whether or not the
