Hospital unveils new diagnostic imaging department

The third and final phase of the $14.2-million construction/renovation project at the Georgetown Hospital was completed last week as the new diagnostic imaging department was unveiled for staff members and the first patient will be accepted today (Thursday).

The new department is located where the entrance to the emergency room used to be and Georgetown

Hospital Chief Operating Officer Cindy McDonnell joked that it hasn't been uncommon to find staff members lost within the changed configuration of the floor plan.

Diagnostic Imaging Medical Director Dr. Tim Durrant also noted that patients will no longer have to walk through the "bowels" of the hospital to receive a diagnostic scan and will enjoy more privacy.
