Local artist's oil painting classes in demand
at Williams Mill

Lorne Winters' oil painting classes are in demand as students experience success.

Since the fall, the professional artist has been sharing his personal oil painting techniques, developed over 25 years of experience, in a series of classes designed to introduce artists of all levels to his representational style of painting.

Students benefit from customized teaching (maximum four students per session) in an intimate studio setting at his Williams Mill studio. Structured in five-week series, there is lots of flexibility for exploring different directions and topics that arise from individual student needs, interests and creativity. Students begin with still life, use the skills learned to work on landscape and progress to figurative subjects. Students learn to adapt Winters's tips and techniques to their own individual styles.

Current students range from professional artists expanding their knowledge base to beginner painters.

"Oil painting is always something I've had the desire to try but wondered if I actually could," said one student. "Lorne's laid back environment and step-by-step instructions make his class truly inspiring and easy to learn. I have surprised myself at how well my painting has turned out."

"Lorne Winters is a great teacher. His gift is delivering purposeful instruction in the guise of encouragement and humour," said another.

This is a unique opportunity and spaces are very limited. For more information, check out lornewinters.com. Contact Winters at 905-601-4845 or by email lwinters@sympatico.ca for details and to book your spot in an upcoming series.
