Game of 72 worries local cops

The Game of 72 could also create credibility issues for the person who practises it, said Corner.

If that person pulls such a prank and later legitimately goes missing, Corner said while police would still conduct a thorough investigation, members of the public and the media, however, may not take the disappearance seriously and provide the assistance to police, which can be crucial in such situations.

Police emphasized the recent missing teen cases in Oakville were not prompted by the Game of 72 and that no such connection has appeared with any missing person case in Halton.

Corner is advising parents to let their children know this game is out there and to talk to them about what the consequences of disappearing for 72 hours could be for themselves, their parents, the police and community.

Corner noted young people, not in the custody of their parents, face any number of unanticipated dangers.
